

Blue water

Blue water refers to the freshwater resources found in rivers, lakes, and aquifers. It is essential for human consumption, agriculture, and industry. Sustainable management of blue water resources is vital for ensuring water availability in the face of climate change.

Green water

Green water represents the moisture in soil used by plants for growth, primarily through precipitation. Effective management of green water is essential for agricultural productivity and ecosystem health, especially in drought-prone areas.

